

Namita Wahi

SAI Graduate Student Associate, 2012-2013

Namita is an S.J.D student at Harvard Law School. Her doctoral dissertation examines how the Supreme Court of India has, over the last sixty years, managed tensions between the right to property and the state's power to acquire property for the purposes of redistribution and economic development. During her S.J.D, Namita has worked on projects with PRS Legislative Research, New Delhi where she wrote papers on campaign finance and parliamentary reform for the first PRS Annual Conference and provided legal assistance to FishMARC, an organization seeking to protect traditional rights of fishermen against displacement by the Mundra Port and Special Economic Zone and other power projects in Gujarat, India. Prior to her S.J.D, Namita worked as a litigator at Davis Polk and Wardwell in New York, where she practiced primarily in the areas of bankruptcy, securities and pro bono criminal defense and asylum law. Namita has clerked with Justice R.C. Lahoti, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of India. Her representative publications include "India: Citizens, Courts and the Right to Health: Between Promise and Progress?" Litigating Health Rights: Can Courts Bring More Justice to Health? (Harvard University Press, 2011) (coauthored with Sharanjeet Parmar) and "Human Rights Accountability of the IMF and the World Bank: A Critique of Existing Mechanisms and a Theory of Horizontal Accountability", 12 U.C. Davis J. Intl L. & Poly (2006).
