

Corrina Moucheraud is a doctoral candidate at the Harvard School of Public Health, in the department of Global Health and Population. Her research is focused on how information can help improve health in resource-poor settings--including an assessment of the potential impact of different approaches to reducing maternal mortality in Nepal, from discrete interventions to health systems strengthening. Corrina holds an MPH from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, and a BA from Wellesley College.