

Erum Sattar, is a doctoral candidate at Harvard Law School, and the Editor-in-Chief of the Harvard Asia Quarterly affiliated with Harvard's Asia Center. A Barrister-at-Law from Lincoln's Inn, Erum believes in the human potential to solve even the world's most intractable problems. This belief drives her deep commitment to SAI's work in Pakistan and the broader South Asian region with a commitment to enhance SAI's footprint in Pakistan in ways that meet the country's research and development needs. She is also the President of the Harvard Pakistan Student Group, the first University-wide student group recognized by Harvard University. Erum's doctoral research focuses on Pakistan's development architecture. She is exploring the linkages between the institutional and legal structures of the country's rural agricultural economy based on the control of water and land resources in the Indus river basin. Erum says, "It is critical to help build social and institutional structures that enable human agency, creativity and problem-solving".
